

Representative Marjorie Taylor Greene, the right-wing Georgia Republican who first discovered politics by way of the QAnon conspiracy theory, has always been one of President Trump's most ardent acolytes in Congress.

But these days, she is finding plenty to criticize about her "favorite president," particularly his turnabout on revealing a complete accounting of the Jeffrey Epstein case.

"It's a full reversal on what was all said beforehand, and people are just not willing to accept it," Ms. Greene said in an interview, after the Justice Department said no further disclosures would be "appropriate or warranted" when it came to the disgraced financier who died in prison in 2019 while awaiting trial on sex-trafficking
